Question # 2

What is the difference between waterfall model and software process model?

Answer:-

Waterfall model is one type of software process model.

So there is no difference between the two but they share a parent-child relationship.

A software process model is used in software engineering and it encompasses a set of activities, methods, actions, tasks and products.

A waterfall models is a linear model that suggests a systematic, sequential approach to develop a software starting from communication with the client and passing through planning, modeling, construction to the deployment, delivery and feedback.
