Community Director Job Interview Preparation Guide.

Question # 1

Tell me what initiatives would you take to increase engagement/retention/growth in our community?

Answer:-

Engaging, keeping, and attracting new users are goals for most (but not all) communities. Be prepared with two or three ideas to achieve these goals. Don't worry about presenting original ideas here-you're interviewing for a job, not providing free consulting advice. Just show the hiring manager that you have ideas. If you suggest ideas they've already tried, well, that shows you're on the same page.

Question # 2

Tell me what communities are you a member of?

Answer:-

Your interviewer is asking this question to see if you can demonstrate your understanding of what a community is and what it means to belong to one. We're all part of many communities throughout our lives. If you're an active commenter on BuzzFeed and know the other commenters there, then you're part of the BuzzFeed community. If not online, maybe you were a member of an after-school club or local charity. Be capable of talking about a time you contributed to a community in some shape or form.

Question # 3

Tell me how would you announce a new feature, initiative or respond to problematic users of the website?

Answer:-

Getting the candidate to draft up some email responses, forum posts or a blog post gives you some insight into their writing and communication skills, and how they approach solving problems by email. You can also find out whether they are finding it easy to pick up on the voice of your company, or have any thoughts about how to modify it when communicating with online customers.

Question # 4

Tell me which content should I be sharing?

Answer:-

Content works differently for each brand. Some fans appreciate videos more than photos, others like good ol' fashion links. We all know that photos generally reign supreme on Facebook, but maybe your brand's videos are engaging your users as well. Either way, the most important aspect of this is understanding which visual content your customers appreciate the most.

Question # 5

Tell me what tool do you recommend we build our community/new feature on?

Answer:-

If all they suggest are hosted community platforms, you might have a skill. An open-minded and competent community manager will be able to build a thriving space using free tools if necessary, and will most likely respond by asking what the requirements are, as this will dictate the toolset, not the other way around.

Question # 6

Tell me what made you choose Community Management as a career? And why are you interested in working for us?

Answer:-

The first part of this question will answer what makes them tick, and what matters to them when building and managing an online community. The second part allows you to ascertain whether they are knowledgeable about your product, passionate about being your digital mouthpiece and evangelising about your company. You could also ask them how they would identify whether an issue needs to be shared with another one of your departments, which also provides a good opportunity to move into describing your company structure and progress the interview to answering their questions.

Question # 7

Explain me which online communities have you managed in the past and what were your responsibilities?

Answer:-

An obvious question, but one that throws up almost everything you need to know about their skill set. An ex-Community Manager may turn out to be more competent than a Head of Community, depending on the scope of their role and their position in the organisation. As job titles are still very fluid, use this question to flesh out just how experienced they are and whether they were running teams or influencing any other departments.

Question # 8

How do you define a community?

Answer:-

"Community" as a term is something tossed around in conversation frequently, but few folks have thought to consider what it actually means. Good community talent will have their own opinions and theories and will be able to provide a succinct definition off hand. Red flag answers will include vague references to social media and content - and community management is not the same as social media.

Question # 9

Do you know what's the difference between comments and answers?

Answer:-

Comments contribute to the conversation and can help users gain additional answers or perspective. Answers are solutions or contributions that do not need further elaboration or clarification.

Question # 10

Explain me about a time you handled a member/customer who was difficult, impatient, or upset?

Answer:-

Many community manager roles involve elements of customer service. After all, you're interacting with people daily and will often encounter someone who is reaching out to you with an issue that needs solving. Let your interviewer see that they can trust you to be the face of and voice for the community.

Question # 11

Tell me how do you define an online community?

Answer:-

Right off the bat, this question can stump many candidates. I've heard a lot of vague answers about social media platforms that veer off on an incoherent tangent until they fall off a cliff. Keep it straightforward by giving a simple definition that explains what an online community is: a group of people who share a common goal, cause, or interest and gather together to collaborate and discuss via the internet.

Question # 12

What is your experience with writing and blogging?

Answer:-

will be responsible for managing the company's blog. Being familiar with the blogging community, various blogging platforms, and general blog writing skills will all play an important role in their day-to-day activities.

Question # 13

Tell me in what way are you a community person?

Answer:-

This question allows the interviewee to tell you about what communities they participate in on a daily basis and why they see themselves being a good fit for your role. This question will also draw clear lines between community folks and interviewees who are simply good on the twitters, can manage a support box like a pro, or can throw a fun party. It's not that these skills are not important or relevant to being a community manager, but what's more important is that there are true community skills supporting these efforts.

Question # 14

Explain me how would your strategy differ when managing our social media outposts and our branded community?

Answer:-

This is our first question referencing social media. This is a great one for probing for use of buzz words, generic statements about social media and kool-aid, fishbowl, echo chamber reactionism. We're looking for an in-depth answer outlining the differences of each audience and why each platform should have its own focus and approach (engagement, attrition, monitoring etc), and what that would be. It's also a good way to check whether the candidate has looked at your community eco-system before walking through your office door.

Question # 15

Tell us which online communities are you a member of?

Answer:-

I'd expect more than just a Twitter/Facebook answer here. A few niche examples suggest they are capable and aware enough to identify the right places to promote your own community and grow your audience. They are also more likely to have been exposed to different management styles which will help them craft something for your community, rather than blindly rehashing something they read in a book or blog (yes, including this one)

Question # 16

Tell me how many hours does a Community Manager work?

Answer:-

This will tell you whether your candidate truly understands the reality of managing online communities. Technically, unless you close your branded community at set hours, life goes on 24/7 online so candidates need to appreciate they may be on call when needed. If they say 9-5, say thank you and goodbye.

Question # 22

Tell me what social media platforms are you on and which do you find most important for business?

Answer:-

A question like this not only tests their knowledge of popular (and not so popular) social networks but it will ask that they apply it to business. Since the responsibility of a Community Manager is to know how to apply social media to business this is an important discussion to have. Being a community manager goes beyond knowing how to post and onto what and why content should be shared with the community.

Question # 23

Tell us how does your approach change when managing different social media platforms?

Answer:-

It's a common misconception that a social media manager is the same as a community manager. However, being a community manager often involves creating content and interacting with users on social media accounts. Simply being a personal user of Facebook, Twitter, or Instagram is not enough to show that you can manage a brand or business social media presence, if that's part of what the role you're interviewing for asks for (many will ask for this, many will not- this is why you need to do the research).

Question # 25

Tell me how do you deal with difficult people, arguments in your community, or legal/security risks?

Answer:-

Back to the nitty-gritty of routine community management; how will your candidate take to implementing a solid policy and set of escalation procedures, or write them up from scratch? Asking them for examples of situations they have experienced is useful too. I used to ask candidates in passing how taking the Tube made them feel; you'd be surprised at how many were quick to anger at the mere thought, which didn't bode well.

Question # 26

Tell me what is your outlook on community? If you were offered the position, how would you build and foster our community?

Answer:-

Knowing that the candidate is active in online communities or has an opinion of their importance is critical information to know when hiring a Community Manager. Do they perceive them as a place to share and cultivate relationships or do they find online communities stale or strange? Understanding their comfort level with a variety online communities can be a clear indicator whether they are a top contender for the position. If the candidate gets through the first part of the question, hearing how they would put new plans into effect to foster and build a community is essential. This requires creativity, critical thinking, and strategy wrapped up in one answer.

Question # 27

Tell us who is a typical member of our community, and what do you think is important to them?

Answer:-

Here's your chance to show off that you've done your research on the company and its community. You will be interacting with members on a daily basis, so show the hiring manager that you can get inside the mind of a member and understand why they are part of the community. Even better, back this up with theories from psychology and case studies.

Question # 28

Tell me what metrics do you track, and why? How will you communicate these to management?

Answer:-

A Community Manager who doesn't know which metrics are relevant to their community and doesn't know how to measure the success of their engagement initiatives will soon run into trouble. A star performer will have some ideas that are pertinent to your community by the time they meet you for an interview. It's even better if they ask you who will be viewing the report and devise a custom answer based on that.

Question # 29

Tell me what's the difference between an article and an idea?

Answer:-

Both articles and ideas boost collaboration and strengthen relationships within your community.

Articles are structured documents perfect for capturing and sharing valuable information, such as business processes. Articles are an effective way to showcase expertise and can be up-voted or liked by others based on helpfulness.

Question # 30

Aside from job postings, why should my brand be on LinkedIn?

Answer:-

Let me just say, I think LinkedIn is underrated. On LinkedIn your brand voice can cut through the noise that exists on Twitter and Facebook. People following brands on LinkedIn are genuine fans of the brand or industry. Users following LinkedIn pages are extremely attentive and responsive. Additionally, LinkedIn Groups offer a unique opportunity to engage with users around a common, and often specific, topic. The appeal for a marketer is obvious, although many still haven't jumped on the bandwagon yet. But it's only a matter of time.

Question # 31

I know I have great content, so why aren't people on Twitter sharing it?

Answer:-

Truth be told, some things flop just 'cause. There isn't always a quick fix. But, what you can do is give your content everything it needs to take off. Analytics are absolutely crucial in developing content that will not only get shared by your mom, but by your audience as a whole. Learn from past content's performance, test different tweet copy, target influencers, and speak your customers' language. These considerations are all crucial in packaging content. Question # 32

Tell me is there a best time to tweet?

Answer:-

If I had a dollar every time I got this one... Make sure you're not tweeting when your fans are sleeping! There is a myth that the universal best time to tweet exists. The truth is, there is a different best time to tweet for everyone. For example, Simply Measured, as a B2B company, hits its sweet spot during work hours on weekdays. However, for B2C companies, they may have a better chance at reaching their fans on the weekends. Curious when your sweet spot is? Here's a few ways you can find it:

Question # 34

Explain me about a time that you had to advocate on behalf of someone else?

Answer:-

A major part of the community manager role is advocating on behalf of users, so this question should be a no brainer for anyone you intend to hire. This is also a good question to ask folks who might be transitioning in from another field, as there should be many transferable situations at top of mind ranging from defending younger siblings from bullies to helping a teammate get a promotion. Pay particularly close attention to how they describe the way that they went about pursuing a good outcome - this can be very telling, particularly in its absence.
