Customer Feedback Job Interview Preparation Guide.

Question # 1

How to Keep surveys short during customer feedback service?

Answer:-

The goal is to get a response. You're more likely to get a response if you ask two fast questions than you are if you ask 12 meaty ones. That is downright shocking--and profound--when you consider that response rates for B-to-B surveys can often be less than 10 percent.

Question # 2

How to keep questions simple during customer feedback?

Answer:-

limiting yourself to three types of questions: binaries (yes-or-no questions), scales (asking clients to rate something from 1-10), and open-ended (succinct explanations for client satisfaction or disappointment).

The ideal two-question survey should consist of a first question that is either a rapid-fire binary or scale query, and a second, open-ended question in which you ask clients to (briefly) elaborate on their answer to the first one. But of course, there's nothing preventing you from pairing a binary with a scale, if what you want most of all are quick, quantifiable replies.

Question # 3

Why not to use average scores as an indicator?

Answer:-

It's easy to succumb to the temptation to grade your customer satisfaction in terms of your overall score across all clients. For example, if you have an average score of 8 on scale questions, you might be really satisfied.

But the trick is to dive deeper and see which clients are disgruntled. The idea is to motivate yourself to please these disgruntled clients. To that end, Grading yourself on a tough curve, using the following values:

* Scores of 1-6: Disgruntled. Grade yourself with a -2 score.

* Scores of 7-8: Neutral. Grade yourself with a 0 score.

* Scores of 9-10: Delighted. Grade yourself with a +1 score.

Question # 4

Why we need to respond immediately to feedback?

Answer:-

When clients reply, you need to show you're listening. Here's how to do it in three steps:

* Thank them. Show gratitude for any type of response, even if it's not something you can act on.

* Acknowledge their specific feedback. Make it clear that you understand their request and empathize with their needs and expectations.

* Share how you're going to act on their feedback. Keep in mind your clients manage organizations too. They will grasp that you can't act on everything immediately.

Be honest. Even if their feedback is nothing you plan to act on, let them know their feedback has been passed to an appropriate team. At the very least, your client will feel as if their comments were received and processed.
