Question # 5

Please explain me what would you say are the best ways to elicit cooperation from team members?

Answer:-

Motivation is key to eliciting cooperation and productivity of people individually and as a team. So, I believe one of the most effective ways to get team members to cooperate is to recognize their strengths and delegate tasks accordingly. For example, in the last project I lead I was overseeing three team members. I had the team member who was highly organized to create and maintain the measuring tools, the individual who was most personable spoke with the employees and the last individual is quite analytical, so I had her compile the data in the report. This way, each team member was allowed to play to her or his strengths, which kept both the motivation and morale high.

Question # 7

Tell us what interested you about your prior company? What interests you about our company?

Answer:-

Each employee has a unique career path. This HR manager's interview question digs into what attracted them to prior roles-as well as what makes your current role a good fit right now.

Question # 8

Tell us why did you leave your previous employer (or why do you want to leave your present job)?

Answer:-

Look for honesty and transparency in the answer. Many talented employees lose their jobs in layoffs, so suppress any desire to stigmatize those who were part of a downsizing.

However, if the individual offers a vague reference to differing opinions or the arrival of a new boss, dig deeper for possible performance issues that can be verified through reference checking. "As you listen to each answer, look for a situational context within which you can judge the individual's decision-making abilities, decisiveness and ability to work in concert with others," Falcone says.

Question # 9

Explain me what have your hiring strategies been? How do you find talented people for the company?

Answer:-

Many things can be said here. You are expected to simply give a few examples of your strategies and tactics. You can talk about the larger issues of advertising campaigns. If you personally conduct interviews, you can describe how you decide in favor of any particular candidate. For example, how you examine overall competencies beyond impressive education and experience.

The employers will assess very carefully the personality of the candidate for traits of openness, honesty, integrity, sociability, initiative, flexibility, determination (as opposed to stubbornness), etc. Say that it's not about attracting talented individuals, but about creating a talented community of employees with a common vision.

Question # 10

Tell us how do you collaborate with other company departments in your role as HR manager and why?

Answer:-

To receive information, feedback, and coordinate decisions throughout the company for optimal efficiency, HR managers cooperate with other departments within the company.

For example, they can cooperate with the accounting division to make salary decisions. This way the employee feels adequately rewarded, while the company remains optimally faithful to its budget policies.

Question # 12

Do you know what Is A Grievance?

Answer:-

A grievance in the traditional sense of the word is typically defined as a complaint against an employer by an employee for a contractual violation. Simply put, this means that an employee has a problem with his/her employer and feels the problem is legitimate based on the contract he/she has with the employer. However, not all grievances have to be contractual grievances. Typically, labor unions have a grievance procedure by which they follow and the process of tracking that grievance can take many forms.

* The employee usually files the grievance with a shop steward, grievance rep, or union/management official.

* The grievance rep typically fills out a pre-defined grievance form and submits it to the union for processing.

* The union typically files the grievance and all relevant hard copy documents into a filing cabinet or electronic database, like the IGS.

* The grievance rep and the labor union officials are responsible for keeping track of the grievance meeting steps 1-Arbitration.

* The meeting steps are usually defined in the contract between union and management and typically have timelines that must be met between each step.

Question # 19

Tell us aren't you underqualified/overqualified for this position (depending on their past experience)?

Answer:-

Smart interviewees who might technically be underqualified focus on the experiences and skill sets they'll bring to the position and the value they'll deliver. However, this is a question that often leads to lengthy explanations that can offer real insights into a person's true motivations, good and bad, for seeking the job, Enelow says. Conversely, as highly qualified Baby Boomers age, it's not uncommon for them to seek a position with lesser responsibilities where they can be a strong team player and a mentor to younger employees. So, depending on the position, don't automatically count overqualification against a candidate.

Question # 20

Explain me what kind of a salary are you looking for?

Answer:-

Try to put the ball back in interviewer's court by asking him about the salary they offer for a position like this. Most of the big companies will have a fixed remuneration for each level.

However, if this is negotiable, you will have more negotiation power if you have some work experience. So, know your lower limit (amount below which you can't go) and also know the maximum salary in the industry for the position then put forward a figure which is not very exact. It is better to mention a range. For e.g. if you are expecting something around 55 K, say that you expect something in mid fifties. Don't keep the range too broad otherwise you will be offered something towards the lower end.

If you are a fresher, most of the times you will have to accept the company's offering for the position. However, if you find it too less, you can definitely discuss that during the interview.

Question # 21

Tell us are you a good team player?

Answer:-

Companies look for team players as well as those who are self starters and can work independently, so you need to be versatile:

You should show that you enjoy working in a team. Say that you are open to suggestions from team members and seniors.

It is always good to work in a team as one can get the support of other members and in times of crisis everyone can work together to achieve the goal.

Question # 22

Tell me an example of how you handled a conflict within your team?

Answer:-

Especially in a team atmosphere, it is critical that conflict be handled properly, otherwise it can hurt the morale. That is why I strive to first identify the source of the issue and isolate it as much as possible. I have taken a mediation course, and I utilize those skills to counsel the parties involved and to come to an amicable resolution. I check in with the parties periodically to ensure that the resolution is effective.

Question # 23

Explain me what can you tell me about our company and industry?

Answer:-

Nothing should eliminate a person from consideration faster than a lack of research into the employer's business lines, locations, customer base and company culture.

"I don't take these applicants seriously because they obviously don't take the interview process seriously," says Falcone, who suggests that interviewers should dig for more than superficial answers that could have been gleaned from a five-minute review of the company's website.

"Even at the entry level, while a candidate may not know much about a company, there are multiple opportunities to research the organization in advance of the in-person meeting thanks to Google, Glassdoor and the company's website," he says. "I often refer to this as the 'candidate desire factor,' which can serve as a significant swing factor in the ultimate selection."

Question # 24

Tell us what isn't on your resume?

Answer:-

Applicants who prepare well for interviews and are smooth enough not to sound too rehearsed can be thrown by this inquiry since it requires them to talk about something other than work experiences.

"When I ask this question, I'm often told by candidates that they've never been asked that before, A few struggle and can't think of an answer, but I often hear terrific responses from some candidates who really showcase their soft skills," as well as talk about what's most important to them in their personal lives, he says.

Question # 25

Explain what can you tell me about motivation?

Answer:-

HR managers appraise performance and motivation and introduce necessary changes.

It requires analytical thinking, independence and initiative, problem solving ability, and interpersonal sensitivity. Training is one way to improve motivation. Conflict management is another. You can give specific examples of how you've resolved a conflict (between employee and company or between several employees) which resulted in better motivation.

Question # 26

Tell us what do/did you like most and least about your present/most recent position?

Answer:-

Look for answers that are specific and relevant to the open position. Job seekers who say "it was an easy commute" or "the benefits were great" will likely be job hunting again soon. Instead, identify people who value the same workplace qualities that your company has, such as those who are seeking opportunities on the cutting edge of technology or those who can create teams with strong camaraderie.

When discussing the least-liked aspects of their present or previous job, applicants who mention areas of responsibility that are far removed from the functions of the available job may do well in the position you're hiring for. And, Enelow says, those who say they performed an undesirable assignment well or who learned something useful show that they can stick with tasks, even ones that don't particularly interest them.

Question # 29

Explain me how would you address dysfunction within a team you are leading?

Answer:-

In my experience I have found that it is essential to address an issue at its source. Therefore, my first step is to review how the team is supposed to function to pinpoint where the issue lies. Depending upon whether it is directly related to an employee's character or performance, or if it is related to a program that is not functioning properly, I move forward. I make sure to approach each situation with tact, but I also make sure I am clear and to the point.

Question # 30

Tell us what is more important to you money or success?

Answer:-

This is tricky question, as money and success both are important and you cannot outweigh the importance of one over the other. Personally you might prefer money over success or success over money, but it is better to be neutral when answering this question in an interview:

You can say, that money and success both are important for you, but if you have to choose you would choose success. The reason being, if one is successful money often follows and you need not focus on money over success..

Question # 35

Tell us what is your experience with cost reduction efforts?

Answer:-

I have extensive experience with cost reduction. In my current position as an HR manager, I was appointed as head over the new training program. The previous program was becoming out of date, and it was found that it was not very efficient for its set price. Through extensive research I discovered a new software program that would provide training for various employees at their then-current levels. I presented this information to the supervisor, and once the software was implemented, it helped to increase employee productivity by 25 percent.

Question # 36

Do you know our hiring strategy?

Answer:-

In my opinion, the right candidate is not just the one with the greatest education and skill set. It is important that the individual be able to work in a team and support the company culture. Therefore, as the HR manager, I take time to tailor my questions to the information provided in the resume. I watch for body language and consistency of information throughout the interview. I also ask about knowledge of the company to gauge whether the applicant is looking for a job or a career.
