Painter Interview Questions And Answers

Question # 8

I know you are primarily a self-taught painter, do you ever regret not getting formal training?

Answer:-

No regrets! I'm not sure really what formal training could've done for me that I couldn't achieve with practice and patience. I've often heard negative reviews about formal training for the simple reason that formally trained painters end up painting like their teachers want them too, not in their own way and style. I'm a big believer in that there isn't any 'right' or 'wrong' way to do art. This should not be confused with 'good' and 'bad' art however.

Question # 20

In the past few years you've really geared up your artistic efforts. What brought about that change? How much time do you spend painting per week?

Answer:-

This is easier to remember. Back in 2006 I was walking through Shibuya, and I happened across an art store with an easel on sale. It might seem a little mundane, but I'd never owned an easel before. After that things just progressed. I had been on a painting hiatus for a few years, and after I started again I realized how much I had missed it.

It also helped that the first painting I did in Tokyo is still one of my favourites (Shiro) and I thought to myself 'hmm, I'm pretty good!' ha.

As for how many hours a week I paint, well it depends a lot on my work schedule and what other things are going on in my life, but generally I paint anywhere between 3 and 15 hours a week.

Question # 50

Suppose there was no chance of ever being paid, would you still paint?

Answer:-

I'll admit, it's much more motivating for me to paint when I can visualize some kind of reward for my efforts. I'm not talking about just money here, simple recognition also counts for something as well. If I was the only person left on Earth, I'm not sure that I'd continue to paint. Some artists I've talked to sometimes tell me that they have a tough time selling their paintings, that they become attached to a few of them and never want to part with them. For me it's different. There isn't one of my paintings that I wouldn't part with. The fact that someone is actually interested in my art, and would consider displaying it in their home is what brings me the most pleasure.
